LONDON-TO-PARIS AIR LINE GROWS

LONDON, Sept. 2.—The first week of the regular passenger express air service between London and Paris has proved a striking success. In spite of the bad weather a daily service has been maintained, while today and on several other days it was necessary to add another airplane to the service to carry all the passengers and goods prepared to travel by this route, says a copyrighted dispatch to the Philadelphia Public Ledger.

At the present moment the quickest means of communication between London and Paris is by air, beating the mail, telegraph, and telephone. It is proposed to institute a regular postal air service between the two capitals. While it is expected that a number of business men will make regular trips by air, it is thought that all American visitors to Europe will now have to include an air trip in their itinerary, flying from London to Paris and then visiting the battlefields.
